To explain what looks possibly puzzling if you don't know the rules:

The Turks discern 4 vowels, which are pronounced in the foremost part of one's mouth: e, i, ö, and ü; and 4 vowels, which are pronounced in the back part, near the throat: a, ı, o and u. Original Turkish words (not Arabic loanwords like "Ali") contain only one sort of vowels; the Turks obviously do not like to have the pronunciation spring from one part of the mouth-region to the other. This is one of their basic phonetic rules, which sounds puzzling for beginners, but those who have trained the language for some time soon get a feeling for it.

The following are not technically errata but the correct Turkish names for the English approximations in the figures. As noted on page 76, the software that made these diagrams did not allow Turkish letters. The Turkish names in correct spelling are these:
